OCCIDENT EXPRESS

Peter de Chamier

The year is 2006 – Russia and its billionaires promise riches and an auspicious future, for many the country has become the land of the rising sun, not least for German media czars and politicians. It begins with an accident in Greece, follows manhunts along dusty railroad tracks in the Middle East, and ends with a furniture truck in Switzerland.

The Federal Minister of Public Safety and Internal Security had a diarrhea. He had retired to his private bathroom in the front part of the plane immediately after takeoff and sent for the doctor on call. The doctor was on detail from the army medical corps for the personal service of the minister. He had found him with a very pale face, sitting on the folded down bench above the toilet, wearing green silk pajamas, sickly staring at his polished shoes while trying not to move.

Two German tourists are killed in traffic accidents in Egypt. Their bodies are used to transport a huge amount of dollar bills to Germany. Why are the responsible German authorities not interested in this case?

In the guise of a Canadian journalist Jack Boulder is sent to Egypt by a minor German secret service to inquire about the background, traveling with a German government minister's delegation.

Unintentionally, an airline physician gives Boulder a lead that finally takes him to Spain. Apparently, money trafficking is but a sideline in the context of events. They have their root in recent German history, former East-West business relations kept alive, and are far more complicated and convoluted than everybody thought – and they happen on the level of the new fast and loose German elite.

The novel is set in 2004 in Berlin, Cairo, the Libyan desert – Basel, Potsdam – reminiscences of Budapest in the 1950s and East Berlin in the 1970s – Madrid, Andalusia, and Tuscany ... as the world turns. Another book featuring Jack Boulder, his friend Laszlo Nagy and his companion Malcsi, Dr. Schall – and Jack Boulder's friend Annabel Conti, who still works for a Swiss bank.
